

Today, I waived my right to challenge my extradition to Colorado, and informed Utah and Colorado authorities that I wish to travel to Aspen, Colorado as soon as arrangements can be made for my transfer.

I would not waive my right to a hearing and voluntarily request removal to Colorado unless I was certain that I will be acquitted of the charges there.

I have postponed going to Colorado these past two months for a number of reasons. First, I wanted to determine what remote connection, if any, there could have been between myself and the tragic death in Colorado. As I suspected the accusations made by the Pitkin County District Attorney have proven to be grossly exaggerated, in some instances purely fictitious and totally without merit. Second, I needed time to check into what matters I could challenge in Utah concerning the legality of the extradition. Next, I had to assure myself that I would receive competent legal representation upon my arrival in Colorado. And finally, I wanted to work with my Salt Lake City attorneys in writing my appeal of my kidnapping conviction. The irony is that this wrongful conviction is the major, if not the sole, justification for the charge against me in Colorado.
